

ADVAITA VEDĀNTA

TOPIC: PERCEPTION AND REALITY Question: Is "seeing believing," or can our eyes sometimes fool us? Physical perception is categorized as Māyā, which is an ontological illusion that obscures the absolute truth. The senses perceive plurality and separation where only non-dual unity exists. Ultimate reality is Brahman, the singular consciousness. The eyes perceive the names and forms of objects, but they fail to recognize the underlying spiritual substrate. True belief is not based on sensory data but on the realization of the unchanging oneness that exists behind the perceived material world.

TOPIC: IDENTITY AND THE SELF Question: If your body parts are swapped by robots, do "you" remain the same? Identity is located in the Atman, which is the eternal, unchanging witness consciousness. The physical body, whether biological or mechanical, is merely an external sheath or instrument used by the self. Swapping physical components does not alter the essential nature of the Atman. The self is independent of material configuration and remains the same conscious observer regardless of changes to the physical vehicle. Existence is defined by consciousness, not by the specific matter that constitutes the body.

TOPIC: INTERNAL PEACE Question: Can you remain happy even when everything is going wrong around us? Happiness is defined as Ānanda, which is the inherent and permanent state of the Atman. It is not a reaction to external circumstances but the fundamental nature of being. External events belong to the realm of change and do not affect the internal reality of the self. By detaching from the mind and identifying with pure consciousness, one remains in a state of constant peace. Bliss is independent of worldly conditions because the self is already complete and perfect.

TOPIC: LIFE AFTER DEATH Question: What happens to a person after death? Death is the dissolution of the physical body, but the Atman is eternal and never undergoes destruction. The soul is never born and never dies; it is infinite and beyond the reach of material elements. At the time of death, the consciousness separates from the current physical form and continues its existence. Because the individual self is identical to the universal Brahman, there is no actual cessation of being. Death is merely a transition of the conscious spark from one state of existence to another.

TOPIC: CONSCIOUSNESS AND THE BRAIN Question: Is your brain just a computer made of matter, or a "driver" force steers the wheel? The brain is a material instrument that facilitates cognitive processing and sensory interaction. However, it lacks independent consciousness. The Atman is the primary conscious force that animates the brain and provides the capacity for experience. Without the presence of the Atman, the brain remains inert matter. Consciousness is not a byproduct of biological functions; rather, biological functions are made possible by the presence of the underlying spiritual self which serves as the ultimate driver.

TOPIC: THE NATURE OF EXISTENCE Question: Is life a movie or a dream? Life is defined as a waking dream or Māyā. It possesses relative reality during the state of ignorance, similar to how a dream appears real until the dreamer wakes up. The world of multiplicity is a mental projection upon the screen of pure consciousness. Upon attaining spiritual knowledge, the individual realizes that the separate world was an illusion. The unchanging reality is the observer, while the world of experiences is a temporary appearance that lacks permanent, independent existence.

TOPIC: THE OBSERVER EFFECT Question: Does the world depend on us who is looking at it, or is it there regardless? The world and the observer are non-dual. There is no objective world existing independently of consciousness. The perceived universe is a manifestation of the same Brahman that constitutes the observer. Existence is predicated on being known by consciousness. In the state of absolute truth, the distinction between the subject and the object disappears. The world exists as a reflection of the self, and its appearance is entirely dependent on the presence of the perceiving consciousness.

TOPIC: THE PURPOSE OF LIFE Question: What is the goal of life? The goal of life is Moksha, which is the liberation from the illusion of separation. It is the realization of the identity between the individual soul and the universal Brahman. This is not the achievement of a new state but the removal of ignorance regarding one's true nature. Liberation results in the end of suffering and the cycle of birth and death. The purpose of existence is to transcend the ego and recognize oneself as the infinite, eternal, and non-dual reality.

TOPIC: PERMANENT HAPPINESS Question: Is happiness permanent or temporary? Happiness derived from external objects is temporary and subject to change. However, the happiness that is the nature of the self is permanent and eternal. This state is known as Sat-Chit-Ananda, representing truth, consciousness, and bliss. Temporary happiness is merely a limited reflection of this eternal bliss. By shifting focus from changing objects to the unchanging subject, one accesses a permanent state of joy that is not subject to time, space, or external influence.

TOPIC: COSMOLOGY Question: Did the world just "pop" into existence by itself, or did someone plan it? The world is a manifestation of Brahman, the absolute consciousness. It does not "pop" into existence randomly nor is it "planned" like a material object. It is an appearance projected through the power of Māyā. Just as a dream emerges from a dreamer, the universe emerges from consciousness. Brahman is both the source and the substance of all existence.

TOPIC: CONSCIOUSNESS Question: Where do your thoughts go when you aren't thinking them? Thoughts dissolve back into the substrate of pure consciousness, which is the Atman. They exist in a potential or seed state within the causal body during deep sleep or silence. Consciousness is the screen upon which thoughts appear and disappear. The thoughts go nowhere because they never had an independent existence separate from the observer.

TOPIC: ETHICS AND KARMA Question: If you do something mean but no one sees you, does it still "count"? Every action results in a moral and spiritual impression called Samskāra. These impressions reside in the subtle body regardless of external witnesses. Because the individual Atman is identical to the universal Brahman, nothing is truly "unseen." The law of Karma ensures that every action leaves a trace on the individual's path toward realization.

TOPIC: JUSTICE AND DESTINY Question: Is life fair, or is it just a game of luck? Life is governed by the law of Karma, which is a system of perfect cosmic justice. There is no "luck" or randomness. Every current circumstance is the result of past actions, either from this life or previous ones. Fairness is not always visible from a limited human perspective, but it is the absolute rule of the causal universe.
